Turin: Unspoken, when the film becomes family affair

Nanni Moretti had said this year, the Festival of Turin he heads focuses on private and politics. He kept his word. The recurring motif of the event, including judging titles in competition, seems to be the family, mourning families, which affects everyone wherever we are and the viewers more sensitive to (melodrama) dramas. Have died or will die, in order, fathers (as in the Canadian film Tomorrow), mothers (as in the title Mexican quemar las naves and the French film Give me your hand), children (as in the Australian film Bitter and Twisted and the title Slovenian We've Never Been in Venice) ...

The celebrity in question in The Great Life

Children, in fact, lost more than they die: this is the case with Helen and still compete in the Belgian film Non-called Fien Troch, where both parents are inconsolable since the disappearance of their daughter Lisa five years ago. "I told endless pain and continuous intimately, without a word - pain incomprehensible to the outside," said the director.

The outside world continues to move forward, while Lukas and Grace alone, time stopped and they live their tragedy separately while continuing to expect him (Pierre Todeschini) Wanting to believe that the calls are anonymous telephone calls from her daughter, she (Emmanuelle Devos) by recognizing the hood of a red cross pass on the subway.

Sure the expressiveness of the actors, director closely scrutinizes their faces: "There are a lot of big plans that fill the screen and I wanted the public has the impression of being intimate, almost feel the skin of characters, continues Troch, and that is why I abandoned the wide angles of my first film, Someone Else's Happiness [trailer]. To be sure of the result, I also asked advice my editor. " An editor who is none other than his father, Ludo Troch. The film is truly a family affair at the Festival of Turin.

Unsaid, produced by Prime Time with Versus Film Production and Motel, in collaboration with Ryva, is sold internationally by The Works International.
